Lawyers do more than just represent clients or agencies in legal matters. They also solve problems by helping people navigate through the legal system, by sharing knowledge of resources, by bringing resolution to disputes, and by working more globally to improve systems. All of these activities draw upon a lawyer's interpersonal and intrapersonal skills and knowledge base. By envisioning themselves as problem solvers, lawyers can become more effective and bring increased satisfaction to their practice of law. This seminar will examine this perspective using examples from lawyers with diverse practice areas to help others to incorporate problem solving into their own practice.
